But though educational matters have been to some extent subordinated to great events, it is likely that the war will have a considerable influence upon education in this country, says the Springfield Republican. It ought to give some stimulus to the study of geography, history and languages, subjects by no means neglected in this country, yet not pressed with such energy or success as elsewhere, largely for lack of incentive. If Americans spend years in studying French or German without really learning it, it is because they do not have to; it is a school subject like Latin or Greek, and the pupil is more concerned with passing examinations than with mastering the language for actual use. History and geography, too, are studied with some apathy, as dealing with old unhappy far-off things, and battles long...
